PHARE. Annual reports 1994 et 1995

OBJECTIVE: this report summarizes the actions financed under the PHARE programme in 1994. CONTENT: the Commission states in its report that 1994 marked a turning point in the history of the programme, now that the Essen European Council had decided that it should have a clear objective and act as the keystone to future accession by CEECs. There were two main trends in the programme in 1994: consolidation and integration of partner countries: - consolidation: this relates to two areas: . developing capacities to manage and regulate a market-based system (establishment of new government institutions and creation of a network of NGOs in order to set the market economy on a democratic basis); . investment aid: creating a climate to foster investment and capital contributions in sectors which still have too little support (especially SMEs); - integration: this relates to four sectors: . joint financing for infrastructure investment; . eliminating bottlenecks at borders and setting up customs channels; . a cross-border cooperation programme; . multinational and intra-regional cooperation. To be specific, PHARE financed activities with the following objectives in 1994: . legislative reform and reform of the public-sector administration: intellectual property, consumer protection, technical standards and regulations, customs, the environment, public procurement, banking, tax legislation, transport, telecommunications; . social restructuring: pension reforms and the introduction of social security systems, employment policies and health care; . support for investment: improving the legal framework, supporting investment promotion agencies, releasing funds for SMEs, reforming the banking system, training; . investment in transport infrastructure (trans-European networks to clear bottlenecks at border posts); . cross-border programme: in close cooperation with the INTERREG programme, financing cross-border programmes in the area of transport, public services, the environment, economic development and human resources (implementation of multiannual projects as of 1995); . clearing cross-border bottlenecks: setting up customs corridors and harmonizing customs documentation); . multiannual and intra-regional cooperation: cross-border regional cooperation, questions relating to minorities, cultural cooperation, regional economic cooperation, cooperation on legislation and the environment. As far as the management of the PHARE programme in 1994 is concerned, huge efforts were made to establish a correlation between the aid and the degree of integration of the countries in question. At the same time, work was carried out on: - decentralization; - planning (although the decision on multiannual planning was not taken until the end of 1994); - implementation (decentralized implementation system introduced in 1994 to provide a single, coherent framework for managing projects); - monitoring and evaluation (introduction of huge audits for controlling projects at least twice during their lifetime); - communications.?

PHARE. Annual reports 1994 et 1995

OBJECTIVE: the present report summarizes the actions financed under the PHARE programme in 1995, emphasizing the "pre-accession" aspect of the initiatives taken in the recipient states. CONTENT: the Commission focuses in its 1995 report on the main objective of the PHARE programme on the eve of the new millennium: to help recipient states become members of the Community. In the Commission's view, PHARE has become the financial instrument of the pre-accession strategy of the CEECs. In practical terms, this has meant that the lion's share of the programme's funds have been used for joint financing of new infrastructure projects in connection with the trans-European networks and that cross-border cooperation has increased significantly. PHARE has also endeavoured to support recipient states in their efforts to bring their legislation, standards and practices into line with those of the European Union with a view to preparing themselves for the single market. As far as the actions themselves are concerned, the report demonstrates that efforts under PHARE concentrated on two approaches: continuing the initiatives started in 1994, especially with regard to infrastructures, and implementing the pre-accession strategy: - concentrating on infrastructure investments: PHARE served mainly to revitalize a number of projects by acting as a financial bridge between international financial institutions, private investors and governments in the partner countries. Most joint financing was directed towards transport infrastructures, the environment, energy, telecommunications and developing the private sector. Particular attention was paid to trans-European networks and projects designed to help these countries with the process of economic reform; - cross-border cooperation: all the initiatives started in 1994 were strengthened in 1995. Cross-border cooperation played a major role in terms of the pre-accession strategy: in close collaboration with the INTERREG II programme, the actions implemented related mainly to developing transport infrastructures, telecommunications and energy and a so-called series of "soft" actions relating to tourism, human resources and culture. Inter-regional cooperation programmes were also launched (ECOS and Ouverture) in order to finance cooperation projects between towns and regions in the partner counties; - at the same time, initiatives were implemented following the extension of Community programmes to the CEECs (SOCRATES, LEONARDO and Youth for Europe III). A budget of some ECU 10 million in 1995 enabled these countries to implement joint preparatory actions in this direction (study visits, seminars etc.). In addition, actions were carried out under PHARE in order to improve coordination between Community aid programmes and assistance from other donors (World Bank, EBRD, EIB, OECD). Initiatives such as SIGMA (PHARE-OECD) helped some public institutions in the CEECs to reform. Finally, PHARE started actions as part of the reconstruction process in the countries of former Yugoslavia (mainly Bosnia and Herzegovina). ?

---

The Committee unanimously adopted the report by Mr Jan Marinus WIERSMA (PGS; NL) on the communication from the Commission on the PHARE annual reports for 1994 and 1995. PHARE is one of the most important EU-funded programmes, and it seeks to offer countries which have signed a European agreement aid for economic restructuring and for strengthening democracy. It helps applicant countries in their efforts to satisfy the criteria for future accession. The committee noted that despite funding the PHARE programme to the tune of ECU 6.64 billion over the last seven years the Commission has not managed to set up a system to evaluate the results of aid to eastern european countries (CEECs). The committee noted that PHARE was changing from being a technical aid programme to being a pre-accession aid programme. It was essential against this background to launch a new aid strategy which would involve redefining the main principles of the programme. The committee called on the Commission to complete its own evaluation in parallel with an independent evaluation system, and stressed the need for coordination between PHARE, similar programmes run by the Member States and aid provided by international financial institutions. Priority areas for the future should be projects seeking to: - strengthen democracy, respect for human rights, the free integration of all shades of opinion, secular and religious, in society, the development of stability in all the CEECs (protection of minorities), their economic and social integration and the development of a civil society; - encourage sustainable economic development and infrastructures and to develop commercial relations with countries in the region; - promote nuclear security and the fight against pollution and mutual understanding between the EC and the eastern european countries through strengthening and developing programmes and through cultural and educational exchanges. In the absence of a fully fledged financial system or capital markets in the majority of the CEECs, the new Commission strategy should consist of helping CEECs to implement legislation for the supervision of credit institutions and for stabilizing the financial system and to development of banking and financial systems capable of facilitating the structural adjustments and the privatization of industry. ?

In adopting the report by Mr Jan Marinus WIERSMA (PSE, NL) on the PHARE 1994 and 1995 annual reports Parliament noted that in spite of having allocated ECU 6.64 billion in the framework of this programme during the last seven years the Commission had not yet succeeded in introducing an assessment system capable of throwing light on the impact of the assistance given to the countries of central and eastern Europe (CEECs). It believed that PHARE should concentrate more money on those countries which were lagging behind in the economic reform process and which were therefore further away from EU membership and Parliament called on the Commission to improve its assessment of budgetary appropriations allocated to CEECs in the framework of pre-accession strategy. It urged in particular that PHARE should concentrate on initiatives of genuine value for the outcome of the pre-accession strategy. In this respect it noted that the PHARE programme was being transformed from a purely technical assistance programme to an assistance for accession programme. It was essential in this context to launch a new assistance strategy involving a revision of the main guidelines of the programme. In future the programme should deal as a matter of priority with projects that aim to promote: - democracy, respect for human rights, the full integration of different ideological and religious groupings into society, the development of stability in all CEECs (defence of minorities) and their economic and social integration and the development of civil society; - sustainable economic development and infrastructure and the enhancement of commercial relations between the region's countries; - nuclear safety and the combating of pollution, in particular by means of more effective and more environment-friendly technologies; - mutual understanding between the EC and the CEECs via the strengthening and development of cultural and education programmes and exchanges. At the same time, given the lack of well-developed financial systems and capital markets in most of the CEECs it considered that the new Commission strategy should be one that: - assisted the CEECs to implement legislation relating to the supervision of credit institutions and to the stability of the financial system, - encouraged the development of local banking and financial systems capable of facilitating the structural adjustment and privatization of industries, - involved better coordination with the IMF in order to devise macroeconomic policies that did not penalize growth. It considered that with a view to accession the recipient states should increasingly participate in financing for projects implemented, using their own funds. It reaffirmed its support for the EU-CEECs cross-border cooperation programme and PHARE and hoped that in future this programme could be used for cross-border projects. With regard to assessment as such, Parliament called on the Commission to review the content of its annual report with the aim of including: - an assessment of the concrete results, in the light of clearly defined objectives, - the effective impact of assistance on the pace of reforms, - the contribution of assistance to the pre-accession strategy. It asked the Commission to supplement its own evaluations with an independent evaluation system and stressed the need for coordination between the PHARE programme, similar Member State assistance programmes and the measures taken by the international financial institutions. Lastly it stressed the need for the decentralization of the management of the PHARE programme which should go hand in hand with sound monitoring of the disbursement of funding. In this respect Parliament considered that it was necessary to stop delegating to third parties tasks that should be performed by a public service body and to clarify the role of external experts and in-house service providers. ?
