Broad guidelines of the economic policies of the Member States and the Community for 1997

OBJECTIVE: the document reviews the progress made in the implementation of the Community economic strategy defined in the broad guidelines of the economic policies in 1996 (COS0424). SUBSTANCE: the document considers, in order, the various aspects of this strategy set out in the 1996 Guidelines: - macroeconomic policy mix: in general this mix was in line with the recommendations: monetary policies were oriented towards achieving and maintaining price stability and significant steps were taken in most Member States to consolidate their public finances. Furthermore, wage agreements have increasingly been consistent with the recommendations, the nominal compensation per employee rose by 3.5% in 1996 which is compatible with the aim of price stability, - upturn in economic activity: in the second half of 1996 the pace of economic growth was around 2.25% and the near term prospects are for a progressive strengthening of this recovery, - gradually improving employment outlook: as economic activity gradually firmed, total employment in the Community stabilised and then began rising slowly. Employment would increase by only 0.5% (700 000 jobs) in 1997 and 0.9% (1.3 million) in 1998. Given the growth in the labour force this improvement would leave unemployment at 10.7% in 1997 and 10.3% in 1998, - social dialogue: the Commission has continued its dialogue with the social partners at the European level in the framework of the Confidence Pact. Committed action has taken place in the areas of youth unemployment, lifelong learning and better use of Structural Funds for job creation, - price and exchange rate stability: for the Community as a whole inflation fell to 2.4% and improvements are expected in 1997. The exchange rates have also remained relatively stable within the exchange rate system, - sound public finances: the situation improved significantly in 1996: with the exception of Germany, all Member States made progress in reducing their budget deficit: as an average for the Community the deficit fell from 5% of GDP in 1995 to 4.3% in 1996. For 1997 all Member States are aiming at a maximum deficit of 3% with a view to moving towards the aim of a balanced budget. The only exception is Greece where the government aims at a deficit of 4.2%. In the case of Italy, its deficit would be around 3.2% in 1997, but would increase to 3.9% in 1998 if it did not make the specific measures it adopted in 1997 into structural measures. The efforts to achieve sound public finances are geared mainly towards reducing public expenditure (except in Denmark, France and Italy); - better functioning of product and services markets: a great many measures were taken at Community and national level to boost competitiveness and efficiency of the European economies, and all geared towards improving the single market, - fostering employment and labour market reforms: . with regard to wages, the trend in the Community has increasingly been in line with the objective of price stability, allowing the establishment of monetary and financial conditions favourable to growth and employment creation and with the objective of strengthening investment profitability. For the Community as a whole real wage costs increased by less than 1% in 1996 (for the fourth consecutive year), . with regard to labour market reforms, several measures have been taken in all the Member States including in particular the general reduction in non wage labour costs (in particular for low wages), the establishment of programmes of vocational training expanded or adapted to respond more effectively to labour market needs, establishment of working time flexibility (part-time, temporary contracts, etc.), active reforms in public employment systems. ?

Broad guidelines of the economic policies of the Member States and the Community for 1997

OBJECTIVE: presentation of the broad guidelines of the economic policies of the Member States and the Community for 1997, stressing the need for a return to and consolidation of employment-friendly growth. SUBSTANCE: The Commission points out that, since 1996, a moderate recovery in economic activity has taken hold in the Community: growth has increased from 1.6% in 1996 to 2.4% in 1997 and is estimated at 2.8% for 1998. On the basis of this premise, two fundamental concerns should be given priority by the Member States: although employment is expected to increase moderately in the short run, there is a need to concentrate efforts on reducing unemployment significantly, despite appreciable strides towards the goals of price stability and sustainable public finances, further progress is required if a maximum number of Member States are to participate in the Euro as from 1999. The Commission's broad guidelines for economic policies for 1997 are therefore based on a dual strategy: 1) a growth and stability-oriented macro-economic policy mix: - the EU should aim at bringing down its average inflation rate to 2% and to target such a level over the medium term, - the Member States should endeavour to achieve the objective of a budgetary position close to balance or in surplus in normal circumstances (3% should not be a long-term goal but a 'limit'): in this regard, the Commission emphasizes in its guidelines that priority be given to: reducing public expenditure rather than increasing fiscal revenue, which is harmful to growth; applying structural measures to limit deficits on a sustainable basis, rather than applying one-off measures, investment: public expenditure should focus on investment, particularly in infrastructure, human capital and labour market reforms, cooperation in tax measures: Member States should closely cooperate in this field to avoid any distortion in the operation of the internal market. They should, in particular, examine the possibility of establishing a code of conduct. - through reinforced social dialogue, wage policies should continue to take account of the dual objectives of price stability and investment profitability; 2) structural reforms to promote growth and employment: in the Commission's view, Member States should intensify their efforts to modernize their markets for goods, services and labour by introducing ambitious structural reforms. The EU should, in particular, strengthen the positive impact of the single market by taking new initiatives in respect of services (construction, banking and insurance), public procurement, State aids and deregulation. The existing legal framework should be properly applied and extended to other areas such as taxation, company law and the liberalization of the energy market and telecommunications. New measures are also needed to improve the functioning of the labour market, in particular: - more differentiation in wage agreements according to qualifications and regions, - reductions in non-wage labour costs or lower income taxes at the lower end of the wage scale, - more flexible working time arrangements (e.g. voluntary part-time work), - reforming taxation and social protection systems. ?

Broad guidelines of the economic policies of the Member States and the Community for 1997

The Committee adopted a draft report drawn up by Mrs Christa RANDZIO-PLATH (PES, D), in which the Commission's recommendation for the broad economic guidelines of the Member States for 1997, is criticised. In particular, the Committee felt that the Commission's recommendation was too narrow insofar as it deals almost exclusively with the goals of monetary stability and budgetary consolidation. While agreeing that these are necessary, the Committee felt that such a minimalist approach could do little to significantly improve economic growth, or combat unemployment. The Committee also objected to the fact that the recommendation is mostly concerned with individual guidelines to the Member States rather than with a genuine coordination of economic policies, as provided for in the treaties. The Committee therefore called for the guidelines to be revised to include a real coordination of economic policies based on an appropriate policy mix combining economic, structural, fiscal, monetary and incomes policies. In this policy mix, an active employment policy based on the Essen and Dublin declarations should play a leading role. Finally, to supplement the Broad Economic Guidelines, the Committee called for the introduction of a similar report to be named Broad Guidelines for Employment, thus making employment a priority objective in the coordination of economic policies. ?

Broad guidelines of the economic policies of the Member States and the Community for 1997

The rapporteur considered that the broad guidelines for economic policy had not been sufficiently used to actually achieve a greater degree of coherence in European economic policy. According to Mrs Randzio-Plath, more effective and more binding economic guidelines needed to be promoted and employment needed to be established as an essential element in all other aspects of economic policy. To conclude, the rapporteur stressed the importance of channelling public funds more directly into productive investment and also the need to increase purchasing power in order to raise the level of demand, partly by reducing the tax burden on the labour factor. Rejecting the rapporteur's slightly too pessimistic conclusions, Commissioner de Silguy said that employment could not be decreed away but depended on strong, sustainable and balanced growth. As for demand, he warned that this should not be artificially stimulated as new imbalances would be created. Referring to certain statistics which revealed a gradual increase in both demand, from 1.9% in 1997 to 6.3% in 1998, and productive investment, from 4.8% in 1997 to 6.3% in 1998, Mr de Silguy recommended for this year improved coordination of the economic policies of Member States, including those relating to employment matters. In his opinion, research and development should also be promoted and the labour market should be reformed through a reasonable overhaul of the salary structure, without this necessarily leading to lower salaries. Having noted that investment profitability was at its highest level since the 1960s and that employees had significantly contributed to this healthier macro-economic framework, Mr de Silguy asked employers to relaunch job-creative investment and the authorities to maintain public investment and expenditure, especially on the trans-European networks. Finally, the Commissioner, who was favourable to the substance of the report's main amendments, reaffirmed the Commission's willingness to set up an interinstitutional agreement for implementing Article 103 of the Treaty so that Parliament could be involved more in the multilateral surveillance process.

Broad guidelines of the economic policies of the Member States and the Community for 1997

In the report by Mrs Christa RANDZIO-PLATH (PSE,D) on the broad economic policy guidelines, the European Parliament called for these guidelines to include the coordination of economic policies on the basis of a policy mix combining economic, structural, fiscal, monetary and income policies and targeting medium-term budgetary consolidation. Regretting that the Commission's communication was limited to repeating the principles upon which the convergence criteria are based (price stability and reduction of deficits), Parliament called on the Council to incorporate an active employment policy into its broad guidelines and proposed that the fight against unemployment be incorporated into every policy. In this connection it suggested that a Council formed from the ECOFIN Council and the Council of Ministers for Employment and Social Affairs should submit recommendations to the European Council stressing the importance of knitting together the broad lines of the economic and employment policies of the Member States and the Community and directing them towards achieving a high level of employment. On the other hand, it rejected the proposal from its Committee on Economic Affairs calling for an introduction of a recommendation on 'broad guidelines for employment' to fix the foundation of an EU employment policy. Parliament also called for the introduction of measures to improve skills, training and further training and to create new jobs in the environmental and cultural fields, as well in the caring services. It pointed out that small businesses (SMUs and NGOs) can create a great many jobs and point the way to a new 'social economy' (child care, domiciliary care, safety of public transport, nature conservancy, etc.). Parliament called on the Commission and the Council to take the measures required to restore confidence so as to reduce the amount of precautionary savings and, in this way, to boost internal demand. The Member States were urged to create the conditions which would result in an increase in both private and public investment. Parliament reiterated its call for the establishment without delay of the trans-European communications, transport, energy and environmental networks. It also called for support for SMEs and measures to encourage research and development, in particular by means of appropriate tax concessions. Action was also needed to enhance the complementarity of Member States' economic policies in order to achieve synergies in the following areas: - improvements in the economic, social and administrative environment for firms, particularly small- and medium-sized businesses, - stimulation of innovation and research, - adaptation of education, training and further training systems to technological and social changes, - abstention from social, environmental, monetary and tax 'dumping', which is harmful to the Community. Lastly, stressing the need for improved coordination between policies relevant to employment and the economy, Parliament called for an interinstitutional agreement between the Council, the Commission and the European Parliament with a view to guaranteeing respect for Parliament's prerogatives with regard to information, pursuant to Article 103 of the TEU. ?
