Combating organized crime: trafficking in women, further actions following the COM(1996)0567

PURPOSE : to further actions in the fight against trafficking in women. CONTENT : Since the Commission's first Communication at the end of 1996 on trafficking in women for the purpose of sexual exploitation, public concern about this matter and, in the same period, international co-operation have risen considerably. In particular, the European institutions (Council, Parliament and Commission) as well as European NGOs have actively contributed, to the increase in the general awareness of this unacceptable violation of women's human rights. A number of initiatives have been taken either at European level or in association with partners in third countries and with specialised organisations. Despite this unprecedented mobilisation, there is ample evidence that large numbers of women continue to be trafficked into EU Member States and into other development countries. They are often forced into prostitution, frequently in conditions akin to slavery. The main flow is coming from/or through the candidate countries. The trafficking is often carried out by professional criminal organisations. New networks are created constantly, and their methods become increasingly ruthless. This is a worrying trend for the European Union. Projects in this field, as well as multidisciplinary exchanges of information by experts and research work have, over the last two years, led to a better understanding of this type of organised criminal activity and have enabled certain shortcomings in our efforts to be identified. The objectives of this new Communication are: - to assure that the question of trafficking in women for sexual exploitation remains high on the political agenda of the EU and that the Member States are encouraged to fully implement their legal obligations; - to reinforce international and European co-operation including both governments and NGOs in countries of origin, transit and destination; - to strengthen a multi-disciplinary approach focusing on both prevention, research, law enforcement and an effective sentencing of traffickers, as well as on support to victims; - to address a clear message to the candidate countries, in the context of the accession process, of the necessity to take the national measures and to cooperate with the EU already now on this issue. Furthermore, this communication responds to requests made by the European Parliament to report back, before the end of 1998, on the progress made in relation to the first communication of 1996 (Wadington Report of 27/11/1997). It seeks therefore: - to indicate the present state of play in the fight against trafficking in women and to identify gaps; - to recommend a number of new targeted initiatives as well as the deepening of certain existing actions to the various parties.?

Combating organized crime: trafficking in women, further actions following the COM(1996)0567

The committee adopted a report by Patsy SÖRENSEN (Greens/EFA, B) on the Commission communication on further actions in the fight against trafficking in women. Stressing the links between trafficking in human beings on the one hand and immigration and asylum policies on the other, the committee first called on the IGC to bring EU policy in this area of criminal justice entirely within the Community pillar. It then called for the Union to draw up a clear, harmonised definition of "trafficking" (to cover, for example, all practices akin to slavery, forced prostitution, sexual exploitation, forced labour and forced marriages). To this end a legal framework should be laid down at EU level and effective measures taken in the areas of prevention, protection and aid to victims. In addition, Member States and EU applicant countries should deploy their legislative, administrative and police resources to combat trafficking. They should also develop international cooperation, in particular with Europol and Interpol, to defeat the criminal networks which were in large measure responsible for the problem. The report advocated a number of measures, such as Community harmonisation of national methods for detecting traffickers and bringing them to justice (for example, guarantees of protection for women who agree to give evidence and a reversal of the burden of proof so that it was placed upon the alleged trafficker), and information campaigns in victims' countries of origin. Other proposals put forward included encouraging Member States to prevent abuses of new technologies, in particular the internet, which boosts the market for traffickers (e.g. by offering women for sale), and raising public awareness of the results of trafficking in women (mainly by targeting the male population). Lastly, the committee called on the media to observe their professional ethical codes and to limit or even refuse advertising for the sex trade so as not to play into the hands of the traffickers. ?

Combating organized crime: trafficking in women, further actions following the COM(1996)0567

The European Parliament adopted its report drafted by Patsy SORENSEN (Green/EFA, Belgium) on further actions in the fight against trafficking for women. The Parliament called on the IGC to insert into the Treaty a clear legal base for combating all forms of violence against women and integrating police and judicial co-operation into the Community pillar in order to achieve greater legislative coherence. It recommended a common EU policy focused on a legal framework on combating offenders and protecting victims. It emphasised the importance of a clear and harmonised definition of trafficking and called on Member States and applicant countries to define trafficking in women, and related slavery-like practices, as a crime in their legislation, as well as to set up or reinforce special anti-trafficking police units. The Parliament called on the Commission to make specific proposals towards the harmonisation of national laws and methods of detection and prosecution with a view to ensuring a detailed results, including the seizure of the proceeds of criminal activities and the non-internment of trafficked persons. It advocated measures to protect witnesses and the introduction of rules whereby NGOs may bring court actions on behalf of victims. The key role of Europol was stressed. The Parliament expressed its concern that new information technologies were used to advertise the sale of women and called on Commission and Member States and applicant countries to initiate research on causes and market mechanisms of supply and demand.?
