A new Asia strategy

The purpose of this Commission communication is to define the scope of future European policy on Asia. According to this communication, 400 million Asians will have at least the same, if not more purchasing power than Europeans or Americans by the year 2000. This proves that the Union urgently needs to amend its policy on this part of the world and, more importantly, to strengthen its economic profile in Asia if it is to maintain a dominant position in the world economy. The Union must also endeavour, in the current political context (end of the Cold War etc.), to develop political dialogue with Asia and find ways of involving it in the management of international affairs (especially by monitoring regional conflicts such as Korea and Kashmir). As regards trade, this document proves that it is in the Union's interest to continue to open up markets for goods and services and overcome obstacles to European trade and investment. However, these aspects should not obscure the development aspect, which will continue to characterize European policy on southern Asia beyond the year 2000. The communication therefore proposes implementing a coordinated programme to take account of these different aspects.?

A new Asia strategy

In response to the idea of a Euro-Asian summit floated by the Prime Minister of Singapore, the Council stated that it was favourably inclined to the holding of such a summit in the first half of 1996 at the latest. It instructed the Presidency and the Commission to hold the necessary talks in order to convey that favourable approach and settle the organisational arrangements for such a meeting in the light of the ASEAN discussion paper. The Council finally decided to consider the matter again at its next meeting in May.

A new Asia strategy

The general theme of the report by Mr Jean GOL (ELDR, B) that was adopted was that the EU should make its presence felt in Asia. It aimed to support and supplement the approach proposed by the Commission in its communication "Towards a new Asia strategy". The rapporteur's findings highlighted the importance of Asia: - demographically speaking, including China, Asia accounted for more than half the population of the earth; - economically speaking, Asia was experiencing rapid growth. The World Bank forecasted that by the year 2000 half the growth in the global economy would come from East and South-East Asia alone; - the military strength of many Asian countries was growing. As a result, the European Union should work to develop its relations with Asia. As the committee pointed out, this was all the more important since it was "essential that Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) did not result in bilateral relations from which Europe would be excluded". EU/Asia relations should therefore be developed and to this end the Committee on Foreign Affairs considered that "the Asian countries stood to gain as much as the European Union from joint efforts to improve democratic freedoms". The proposals put forward by Mr GOL to develop this new approach covered several areas: - at political level, he called on the Council "to hold a summit of the Heads of State or Government of the European Union and Asia as soon as possible". With regard to the CFSP, the Council should also accord particular importance to "security and peace issues involving Asian countries". Furthermore, the European Union "should be concerned to develop Asia's enhanced role by means of better Asian representation in international fora through deeper political dialogue". - at economic level, the Committee on Foreign Affairs stated that relations should be developed on the basis of "a partnership with Asian countries". It believed that any agreements concluded should take into account "mutual respect for human rights and democratic principles" and pay particular attention to steps "to reduce child labour". To achieve this new partnership, the Commission should: - make provision for the necessary financial resources; - develop training programmes for students and teachers; - expand the European Union's presence. ?

A new Asia strategy

In its resolution, the European Parliament stated that it was very much in favour of stepping up relations with the Asian countries. Although it stressed the importance of the Commission communication and need to accord greater priority to Asia, the EP felt that this could only be regarded as a first step and that the framework proposed by the Commission should be supported by more intense and differentiated strategies for the various parts of Asia. To this end, Parliament recommended a genuine partnership with these countries and called on the Commission to take a series of initiatives, in collaboration with Parliament itself, to strengthen relations between Europe and that part of the world: - provision for new budgetary items broken down by geographical region, - establishment of training programmes as well as exchanges for young people, - promotion of Asian studies, modelled on the Community's work relating to Latin America (IRELA), - support for regional institutes pursuing European studies in Asia, - expansion and strengthening of the Community's presence in Asia, including its commercial presence. In particular, the EP called on the Council to give priority to security and peace issues involving Asia and it hoped that the Union would have a higher profile at local level as a provider of development aid. Political dialogue with these countries should be stepped up, including dialogue on nuclear issues (nuclear test ban). Parliament again stressed that any agreements concluded with Asian countries should be based on a clause concerning "respect for human rights and democratic principles". With regard to "social dumping", which was a source of conflict between Europe and Asia, Parliament pointed out that the growth in Asian countries was largely due to government investment, foreign capital and low wages. The economic growth of these countries should thus be accompanied by an improvement in social and economic safeguards. With regard to trade, the Union should identify the priority areas for economic cooperation to assert Europe's trade interests. The liberalisation of trading relations with the Asian countries should also be based on open dialogue resulting in the inclusion of environmental and social clauses in the agreements concluded with Asia. Similarly, Parliament stressed that all comprehensive cooperation agreements should contain provisions on investment protection. The EP also called on Japan, the EU's main commercial partner in the region, to intensify its efforts at market liberalisation. There should be sustained efforts to help the poorest countries in the region. Finally, Parliament called on all the Asian countries to ratify the Law of the Sea Treaty and on China to join the WTO. Parliament also called for the rapid conclusion of an agreement with Vietnam and proposed that consideration be given to concluding contractual relations with Iran at the appropriate time. ?
