

Need for an EU strategy to end and prevent the gender pension gap

2016/2061(INI) - 14/06/2017 - Text adopted by Parliament, single reading

The European Parliament adopted by 433 votes to 67, with 175 abstentions, a resolution on the need for a European Union strategy to end and prevent the gender pension gap.

Parliament recalled that, in 2015, the average gender pay and pension gap (i.e. the gap between the average pre-tax income received as a pension by women and that received by men) stood at 38.3% in the 65 and over age-group across the EU's 28 Member States. It also recalled that this gap has widened in half of the Member States over the past five years.

The financial crisis of recent years has also had a negative impact on the incomes of many women; in some Member States, between 11 and 36% of women have no access at all to any pension.

Taking the view that gender gaps were unacceptable and needed to be addressed, Parliament called on the Commission, in close cooperation with the Member States, to put in place a comprehensive strategy to eradicate gender pay gaps in the European Union and to assist them in establishing guidelines in this area. It supported the Council's call for a new Commission initiative to draw up a gender equality strategy for the period 2016-2020. This would be adopted in the form of a communication and enhance the European Union's strategic engagement on gender equality, linking it closely to the Europe 2020 strategy.

Parliament believed that this strategy should not be limited to correcting the effects of the pension gap in the Member States, in particular in regard to the most vulnerable, but also to preventing it, by tackling its root causes, such as inequalities between men and women in the labour market in terms of earnings, career progression and full-time employment prospects, as well as labour market segregation.

In this regard, it encouraged dialogue and exchanges of good practice between the governments of the Member States.

It stressed the multifaceted nature (a combination of measures under various policies to improve gender equality) of the approach needed to carry out the strategy, which should consider:

- retirement taking into account the full working life of the person,
- differences between men and women in terms of the level of employment, careers,
- contributory opportunities and those arising from the organisation of pension systems.

Role of trade unions and minimum income: Parliament drew attention to the important role played by the social partners in debates on minimum income, while respecting the principle of subsidiarity. It stressed in particular the important role of trade unions and collective bargaining in enabling elderly people to access public pensions in line with the principle of intergenerational solidarity and the principle of equality between men and women.

It called on the Member States to put in place anti-poverty measures for workers whose health does not allow them to work until the legal age of retirement. The Committee considers that early retirement measures for workers exposed to arduous or hazardous working conditions should remain in place.

Parliament believed that raising employment rates through high-quality jobs could help to reduce considerably the future increase of people unable to work until the legal retirement age and, thereby, to alleviate the financial burden of ageing.

Moreover, Parliament was deeply concerned about the impact on a growing number of Member States of the country-specific recommendations on pension schemes and their sustainability, which were drafted in a spirit of austerity, as well as about access to contributory pensions, and the adverse effects of these recommendations on income levels and social transfers.

Assessment and awareness-raising to better address the pension gap: Parliament called on the Member States and the Commission to continue investigating on the pension gap and, in partnership with Eurostat and the European Institute for Gender Equality (EIGE), to work to develop formal and reliable indicators on this gap.

Other measures are envisaged to address the causes of the pension gap between men and women, such as: (i) the creation of a formal indicator of this phenomenon; (ii) strengthened measures to inform women about the consequences of this gap; (iii) sensitising public opinion on issues related to pay equality and the pension gap, as well as to direct and indirect discrimination against women in the workplace; (iv) formal studies on the effects of the pension gap between women and men on pensions and women's economic independence.

Reducing inequalities in contributory opportunities: Parliament unreservedly condemned wage gaps between men and women and their supposedly "inexplicable" nature, given that it is clear that they are the result of discrimination in the workplace. It reiterated its call for the revision of Directive 2006/54/EC.

Parliament called on the Member States and the Commission to ensure the application of the principle of non-discrimination and equality in the labour market and in access to employment and in particular to adopt social protection measures to guarantee the remuneration and social rights of women.

Member States were called upon to:

- provide for appropriate measures to reduce cases of violation of the principle of equal remuneration for equal work or equal value between men and women;
- implement useful and practical employment assessment tools to determine what constitutes work of equal value in order to guarantee equal pay for women and men and, consequently, the equality of pensions that they will receive later;
- combat horizontal and vertical segregation in the labour market, eliminating inequalities and discrimination between men and women in employment and encouraging women and girls to pursue studies, trades and careers in sectors that are growing and innovating.

Parliament also called on the Member States to pay particular attention to women who do not have financial autonomy in the event of divorce.

Reducing inequalities between men and women in career paths: Parliament urged Member States to respect and enforce maternity rights legislation so that women are not harmed in terms of pensions because they have had children in the course of their professional careers.

It called on the Member States to consider employees being given the possibility to negotiate voluntary flexible working arrangements, including 'smart working', in line with national practice and independently of the age of the children or family situation, thus allowing women and men a better work-life balance.

Parliament also took note of the Commissions proposal on caregivers leave in the Directive on work-life balance for parents and carers and reiterated its demand for adequate remuneration and social protection.

It encouraged Member States to introduce 'care credits' for both men and women to compensate for career interruptions for the informal care of a family member, as well as periods of leave, such as maternity and paternity leave and parental leave. In this regard, it stressed the importance of taking measures that encourage men to take paternity leave.

In particular, Parliament called on the Member States to enable the transfer of the employee after the maternity or parental leave back to the comparable work arrangement.

Impact of pension schemes on the pension gap: Parliament called on the Commission and the Member States to take a closer look at how the pension gap might be affected by a shift from statutory state pensions towards more flexible arrangements in occupational and private schemes for pension contributions, with regard to the calculation of the duration of contribution to the pension system and to arrangements for gradual retirement.

It warned of the risks to gender equality represented by the shift from social security pensions to personal funded pensions, since personal pensions are based on individual contributions and do not compensate for times spent caring for children and other dependent relatives, or for periods of unemployment, sick leave or disability.

It called on the Member States to remove elements of their pension systems and of the reforms implemented, the factors that add to imbalances in benefits.

For Parliament, each strategic change related to retirement pensions needed to be measured against its impact on the gender gap.

Lastly, the Commission and the Member States are also called upon to introduce single-sex tariffs for life in pension schemes and care credits.

Parliament also called for individualisation of pension rights.

Lastly, Parliament stressed that everyone should have the right to universal access to a public pension and recalled Article 25 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the Union, which enshrines the right of the elderly to lead a decent and independent life.
